Antonio Stradivari – Cremona 1734, “Lam- ex Scotland University”

bearing its original label “Antonius Stradivarius Cremonensis faciebat anno 1734”

The 1734 Lam ex-Scotland University Stradivarius Violin is on gratuitous loan from the Si-Yo Music Society Foundation, Inc. and the family of Sau-Wing Lam.

This violin is crafted with a two-piece spruce top; a faint, broad curl descending to the right marks the one-piece maple back. The maple ribs stand out compared to the other parts of the instrument. The violin bears a maple head. The original deep red varnish lies over a golden-yellow ground. The violin was formerly owned by Heath, an English amateur player. W.E. Hill & Sons of London acquired the instrument in 1873 and subsequently sold it to another amateur player named Neil. After Neil's death, this instrument and his others were bequeathed to one of the Scottish universities. Subsequently, the violin was again sold to the Hill company. The instrument was then passed on to Rudolph Wurlitzer of New York in 1941. Edward S. Cole then purchased the instrument. This violin is an exceptionally bold and typical example of the maker's work from the later period.
